

I oppose gutting consumer privacy laws in Wisconsin. The no-call law is clearly NOT "hard to comply with" as one bank claimed. They need only avoid telephoning people who have not asked them to intrude into our homes. Although the national government has a legitimate interest in setting minimum standards for interstate business, I don't know of any legal or policy basis for diminishing the powers of the States to provide better than the minimum standards. This relief, assuming it is granted and withstands any subsequent challenge, would likely be short-lived since it is clear that citizens are anxious to use any and all tactics available to restrict business calls.
